Starting the Conversation

When your loved one has been diagnosed with memory loss, they can often feel depressed, anxious and ashamed – they may even refuse to accept or talk about their diagnosis. Memory loss changes everyone's lives, so it's important to support your loved one as much as you can during this difficult transition.

Talking to Your Loved One about their Memory Loss Diagnosis

Starting the conversation is important because it allows your loved one to begin to accept what is happening and helps you both come up with a plan for the future. This can be difficult and may take some time, so follow these tips to make communicating easier.

Read up on your loved one's form of memory loss as much as you can. This can help you know what to expect and help your loved one feel as though you understand them.

Provide them with as much support as possible. Whether you are comforting them through their emotions, joining them for educational classes or simply being there to listen to their concerns and fears, it's important to be someone they can talk to and lean on.

Talking to Your Loved One about their Memory Loss Diagnosis

Give them some time to cope. Forcing the subject could cause your loved one to become angry or upset. Gauge their reactions and see how they may be feeling before bringing up their diagnosis. You are more likely to have a successful conversation if they are willing to talk.

If your loved one doesn't want to talk about their diagnosis, it can help to ask how you can support them or make them feel better. Use this feedback to provide them with the care and love they need during this time.

If they refuse to accept their diagnosis or seem to be increasingly depressed, talk to their doctor or the experts at a leading memory care community.
